Lee left Richmond yesterday merning for the camp at Monterey. He has been long wishing to take the saddle, but it is understood wishing to take the saddle, but it is understood that Davis has apposed his doing so. that President Davis has opposed his doing so, because of the immense value of his services to the Manassas electron the Confederate States in the marshaling and disposition of troops at this important renderevous. The southern people have heard but little of Gen. Les during the past three months, but it may be said with truth that the successes which have attended our arms thus far could never have been accomplished without his silent but vigorous and uncassing exertion in the cause. His life, since he assumed the chief roommand of the Virginia forces, has been a model of sol lierly patience and energy and watchfulness. Six o'clock in the morning has watchfulness. Six o'clock in the morning has seen him regularly enter bis office, which, with rere exceptions, he has not left, save at meal times, till eleven at night.
